

Liya is an intellectual and cultural historian of modern Russia with a sensitivity to transnational and global perspectives. She is interested in how individuals confronted and navigated the challenges of modernity and the crisis of values, especially the ethical implications of shifting moral codes in the age of uncertainty. She received her B.A. in Global Cultural Studies with University Honors from Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri and two M.A.s in History from Higher School of Economics in Russia and Princeton University respectively. She currently resides in Princeton, NJ and is working on her dissertation about Russia's imagination of multiple Orients. In her free time, she is passionate about learning foreign languages and practicing yoga.
