

Matthew Dowd is a Ph.D. candidate in the History Department at Princeton University. His doctoral research illuminates the profound impact of the conflict between Catholicism and emerging secularism on the political and economic fabric of 19th-century Europe. He holds a B.A. in International Relations and French from Tufts University and an M.A. from Université Paris 1 Panthéon-Sorbonne. Outside of his scholarship and work with FASPE, Matthew enjoys playing tennis, ice skating, and writing music.
